

BAR MENU

London Southend Airport was originally created as a flyer base in the First World War, during which it became the largest flying ground in Essex.

Years later the site was purchased by Southend Council and was officially opened on 18th September 1935 as Southend Municipal Airport. The start of the Second World War saw the site requisitioned by the RAF again and during this time a number of squadrons of various nationalities were based on the site, with the runways playing home to the Supermarine Spitfires, Hawker Hurricanes and Bristol Blenheims.

Returning to life as a civil airport, two new runways were laid in the 50's which led to commercial flights for passengers and cargo operations, where services were run to a variety of European destinations and the Channel Islands.

The site is often remembered for its car ferry flights operated by British Air Ferries, gaining notoriety by appearing in the 1964 Bond film, Goldfinger, where James Bond is seen driving his Aston Martin DB5 to the airport to board a British United Air Ferries Carvair to pursue Goldfinger to Switzerland.

In 1967 there were a record number of passengers using the airport, a staggering 692,686, and Southend continued to handle more traffic than Stansted into the mid 70's, making it London's third most popular airport at the time.

In 2008 the site was purchased by the Stobart Group, who's substantial investment has seen the opening of the new London Southend Railway station, the introduction of a state of the art passenger terminal and air traffic control tower, a runway extension and most recently the Holiday Inn Southend. With further developments planned an exciting future lays ahead for London Southend Airport.
